ADVERTISEMENT.

EVERY classical scholar must have long beheld with regret, the imperfection and inaccuracy of the common editions of AINSWORTH'S DICTIONARY. Owing either to the carelessness or unskilfulness of Editors, or to the want of public spirit in Publishers, the errors of former editions have been implicitly copied, and incorporated with those of the new, till the book is at length become very incorrect. To remedy these defects, as far as was consistent with the nature of an Abridgment, has been the object of the Editor of this Edition, of which he has only a word or two to say, leaving the success to the judgment of the public.

It is printed from the last Edinburgh Edition, corrected by a late excellent classical scholar; and has been read by the London Stereotype Edition, compared with the original Quarto, as well as Littleton, and the late improved and excellent Edition by Dr Carey. In the English part, it has been occasionally compared with Young's Edition. By these comparisons, and by recourse to the authors referred to, many hundred errors have been corrected.

In the English part, considerable improvements have been made both in the spelling; and arrangement: many new words have been added, particularly in the Latin: in many instances entirely new descriptions have been given; and in some cases, the authorities enlarged. The quantity of every word, so far as it is known, or could be determined, either from analogy or the use of the poets, has been accurately marked. The construction, too, as well as the phrases and idioms, have been carefully pointed out by their respective characters: and throughout, the strictest uniformity has been observed.

In the Index of Proper Names, also, considerable improvement has been made. Every student is sensible of its deficiency in the ordinary form, and must wish that it could be enlarged. By striking out a number of words that have little or no connection with the classics, by substituting new ones in their room, and enlarging the description of others, a compendious, useful, and entertaining key to the history and mythology of the ancients has been formed, without any addition to the size of the volume.

Besides the usual appendage of a Calendar, and Table of Money, there is added to this Edition a List of Roman Authors, arranged according to the ages in which they lived, with an account of the best Editions of their works.

More than two years have now elapsed since this Work commenced; and time, which matures all things, has, no doubt, contributed much to its perfection, though it would be arrogance to assert there are no errors. In a work of this kind, it is almost impossible to avoid them; some will escape even the most vigilant and accurate eye. It is hoped, however, there are but few, and these such, as will no way perplex or mislead the student.

*.* In former editions the Calendar and Tables of Money were much contracted, it has therefore been thought advisable to cancel these and substitute in their place, a copious Roman Calendar, containing the Festivals, Games, Rising and Setting of Constellations, &c. &c. and complete Tables of Money, Weights, and Measures. Besides being carefully revised, this edition has now first added to it an Historical Account of the different ages relating to the purity of the Latin tongue, and a complete List of Letters and Marks of Abbreviations most frequently occurring in ancient authors and inscriptions.

OF THE DIFFERENT AGES RELATING TO THE PURITY OF THE LATIN TONGUE.

THOUGH the origin, growth, flourishing state, and decay of the Latin tongue, may, in my opinion, be most properly represented by the different ages of man, as infancy, youth, manhood, and old age: yet, since those periods of time have been more usually distinguished by metals of greater or less fineness, as gold, silver, brass, and iron; I choose to keep to the method of digesting them prescribed by others, rather than seem too fond of my own opinion, by introducing a new way of my own.

The golden age in this case is generally computed from the time of the second Punic war, to the latter end of the reign of Augustus Cæsar, and comprehendeth the oldest authors in the Latin tongue now extant, excepting the fragments of Limæ Andronicus. Though for a considerable time after the commencement of this period, the language was but yet forming, and by gradual improvements afterwards arrived to its state of perfection under Augustus.

The silver age is reckoned to have commenced on the death of Augustus, and continued to the end of Trajan's reign.

The brass age began at the death of Trajan, and lasted till the time that Rome was taken by the Goths, about four hundred and ten years after the birth of Christ.

The iron age commenced from the sacking of Rome before mentioned, after which the purity of the Latin tongue was very much neglected, and multitudes of barbarous words and forms of expression introduced, to the great disparagement of that noble language.

How rude and unpolished this tongue was in its infant state, appeareth from hence, that the hymns of the Salar priests instituted by Numa, were scarcely understood by the priests themselves, who were contemporary with the flourishing times, as Fabius telleth us, Inst. Orat. 1, 6. And the decemviral, and pontifical laws had nothing of that beautiful diction, which may be observed in the writings of the Augustan age.

Ennius the poet is also described by Ovid, Trist. 2, 424, as ingenio maximus, arte rudis. And Cæcilius is said by Tully, ad Att. 7, 3, to be malus Latinitatis auctor.

But in after-times the Romans took great pains in polishing their native language, and even Cæsar himself, when otherwise engaged in business of great moment, wrote a book relating to the speaking of Latin accurately, and declareth therein, verborum delectum originem, esse eloquentia, Cic. de Clar. Orat. 72. Cæsar Cicero the father of the Roman eloquence. Cornelius Nepos, Varro, Sallust, and Livy, may justly be reckoned the greatest writers in prose; and Plautus, Terence, Lucretius, Virgil, Horace, and Ovid, the greatest poets; who all lived in the golden age.

Cicero, Paterculus, Columella, Curtius, Tacitus, Pliny the historian, Suetonius, and some other prose writers, flourished in the silver age: and Persius, Lucan, Silius Italicus, Valerius Flaccus, Juvenal, and Martial among the poets; and the two Senecas distinguished themselves by their writings on moral and other subjects.

Justin, Alius Spartianus, with the other writers of the Augustan history; Eutropius, Vegetius, Macrobius, and Aurelius Victor, writers in prose; Nemesianus, Ausonius, Prudentius, and Claudian, poets, lived in the brassen age, and were a considerable ornament to it.

Though it is usual to judge of the diction of the Roman writers by the age they lived in, yet that this may admit of some exceptions is evident from hence, that Vitruvius, who wrote even in the Augustan age, sinketh in some places far below the diction of his contemporaries; and the style of Valerius Maximus, the writers of the Historiæ Augustæ, Ammianus Marcellinus, and Apuleius, is much worse than of some others who lived in their times; and yet several lawyers, as Æmilius Papinian, Ulpian, and others, wrote in a good Latin style under Alexander Severus; and even Lactantius, a Christian, wrote good Latin in the reign of Constantine, Sulpitius Severus in the time of Honorius, Claudian the poet in the time of Severus, yea and long after, under Theodoric the Goth, Boëthius, a man of consular dignity, wrote in so pure a Roman style, that if we were ignorant of the age he lived in, we should take him for a contemporary of Cicero.

In after-times the beauty of the Latin tongue declined very much, and many base words were introduced into the language, especially by the ecclesiastic and physical writers, the use of which ought to be carefully avoided by all persons studious of writing in a good Latin style. The surest way of obtaining which, is carefully to read, make observations upon, and imitate the purest Latin writers, especially those who come the nearest to Cicero, to whose valuable writings this language is very much indebted.
